ABSTRACT

This article summarizes this content by discussing the international conflict research under the paradigm of international relations psychology. It can be clearly and intuitively understood that for international relations psychology, it mainly deals with international behavior and several major psychology of research: Individual psychology, international psychology, and national psychology. The theory of international relational psychology is derived from the reference of other disciplines. International relations scholars need to face a complex and illusory world. Especially after the end of the Cold War, international conflicts could not be dispersed for a long time, and the emergence of different forces often focused on the theory of constructivism of international relations psychology. Based on this, this paper focuses on the review and exploration of the international conflict research under the international relationship psychology paradigm, and puts forward corresponding suggestions, and is willing to share with you.
